You turn on the tap and water comes out. It is easy, isn't it? But imagine walking miles in the hot sun to get water. And imagine if that water was dangerous and full of bacteria. Water isn't only necessary for drinking, but also for cooking, washing, growing food, making things and caring for animals. 18% of the world's population don't have safe drinking water, and 42% are without clean water for washing. But 2005 to 2015 is the United Nations Water for Life Decade, and it aims to help more people get access to clean and safe water. There is a lot of water in the world, but unfortunately 97.5% is sea water, which isn't drinkable. Most of freshwater is in the form of ice, so we have to look after the remaining 1% of water carefully.

Tokyo is one of the largest cities in the world. It is a city of great contrasts. Busy motorways and crowded underground trains carry people to and from huge office blocks and factories every day. The streets are noisy and full of people. But just around the corner, you can find peaceful squares and quiet places where life seems unhurried, and unchanged for centuries. Tokyo really is a combination of the old and the new, the traditional and the modern. Harajuku, for example, is an area famous for teenage culture – the streets are full of fashion shops and fast food restaurants,

People in richer countries, who use over 250 litres of water per person a day, will have to use less. Even 20-40 litres a day per person, which is just enough for basic human needs, can be difficult to find in many places. In developing countries, women and girls, who are usually responsible for water, waste time and energy carrying water instead of working to improve their lives. On average, they walk a distance of six kilometres each day, which takes three hours, and they carry 20 litres of water home. If water is nearer their homes, girls have time to go to school. Women also suffer, because they need clean water when they are pregnant or looking after young babies. Diseases carried in water kill up to ten million children a year, putting mothers and their unborn children at risk.
